Bros of Super Smash put on their game faces

Gaming. Bostonians are bonding over Super Smash Bros. tournaments.

Two video game fans face off at a recent Super Smash Brothers tournament held at Good Life Bar. / NICOLAUS CZARNECKI, METRO

On a Wednesday night in Back Bay at Capital One 360 Café, gamers crushed free sandwiches and sodas and hollered as players kicked, grappled and slashed Nintendo avatars on three TVs, while the theme from Zelda played overhead through ceiling speakers.

It was the third and final night of a Boston tournament for the blockbuster video game Super Smash Bros., the colorful fighter that's been among the most popular ever since its first title release in 1999.

In Boston and around the country, at a time when video games have morphed into spectator sports and gamer culture in some form is near universal for Americans of a certain age, Super Smash Bros. is king.

"Just the demographics, the age group gets between younger and older people. It just appeals to more people and it's casual and competitive. I think that's why everybody loves it," said Dan Lanza, organizer and host of Double Tap, a two-person gaming event planning company. Double Tap hosted the tournament at the café — free to all thanks to sponsorship from the bank and its marketing outpost/coffee shop.

Since it first appeared in living rooms everywhere via the N64 console, Smash has been the ultimate in one-size-fits-all gaming, gamers told Metro. One big reason behind its staying power, they said, is the game's even fun when you aren't any good.

"That guy, he hit me, like, three times, and he had a lot of fun doing it," said Marc Maggiore, 19, whose Ness character had just finished stomping over his challenger's Charizard.

For Maggiore, it's the easy-going community that is most attractive about the game. He bonded over hours and hours playing the game with college friends at Colgate University in upstate New York, and said he's gotten involved in the Massachusetts tournament scene while home for the summer.

He met another Smash enthusiast on Facebook just a few days before the tournament, he said. They lived near by, so met up and played for three hours.

"He whooped my ass for three hours, but it was good," he said.

Where to compete

Here is where some of the better known tournaments are taking place in Massachusetts this week.

- Today: Game Underground at the Natick Mall
- Today: Osaka Japanese Sushi & Steakhouse in Brookline
- Wednesday, July 8: Newton Gaming Center in Newton
- Saturday, July 11: Excelsior Comics and Games in Maynard
- There are always more being planned all around the state.

Starting young

Building skills to be the best fighter

The obsession with the game, for many, starts early.

The Boston tournament was the first for Max Hopkins, a 19-year-old Harvard undergrad from Seattle. But Hopkins said he's been playing since the second grade, crafting his skills casually over a decade and developing strategy for the deceptively simple fighter.

"It's just your skill — what you can do in the moment, how fast you are, how you can read the other player. It's just a really in-the-moment experience," he said.

"We're still seeing new things in Melee, and it's been years," he said.

Smash culture, and Melee culture in particular, thrives on college campuses. Most public in Boston are face-offs between schools, like last year's battle that featured Harvard, MIT, BU, Northeastern, UMass, UConn and WPI duking it out in Kendall Square.

Sedatives. Cosby admitted to giving drugs to women in 2005: AP

Legendary comedian Bill Cosby admitted in 2005 that he got sedatives in the hope of drugging young women he wanted to have sex with, and that he gave at least one of the pills — Quaaludes — to at least one woman and "other people," the Associated Press reported Monday night.

Cosby, 77, made the admission during his testimony in a civil case brought by a former Temple University employee, Andrea Constand, who alleged that Cosby tricked her into taking drugs before he sexually assaulted her.

The case was settled for an undisclosed sum but the documents in the case were unsealed yesterday after the Associated Press went to court. Cosby's lawyers had argued that the documents would cause severe embarrassment to the comedian-actor, who is best known for playing Dr. Cliff Huxtable on the hit TV series "The Cosby Show" in the 1980s and '90s.

A representative for Cosby did not immediately respond to requests for comment last night.

More than 40 women have come forward in the past year alleging Cosby drugged and sexually assaulted them in incidents dating back decades.

Cosby has never been criminally charged over the allegations but his career has taken a hit in the past year with TV projects and live shows being canceled. He also stepped down last year from the board of trustees at Temple University, his alma mater. REUTERS

Mystery. Two weeks and still no answers on 'Baby Doe'

Investigators released a composite image of the girl along with photos of her leggings and blanket. / PROVIDED, SUFFOLK DA

The tragic story of an unidentified child's unexplained death reads like a crime novel from Boston author Dennis Lehane: The identity of a little girl, known only as "Baby Doe," remains a mystery two weeks after a dog walker found her lifeless body and a zebra print blanket inside a plastic bag on Deer Island.

"I don't know how a child could be missing this long and no one knows anything about her," Lt. Daniel Richard, spokesman for the Massachusetts State Police, told Metro on Monday.

That question is one that has circulated social media and news media throughout the nation since last month.

As of Monday, more than 43 million people had seen a state police Facebook post asking for help identifying the girl, who is estimated to be 4 years old, Richards said.

But still, investigators have no leads.

An autopsy proved inconclusive, and though the Suffolk County district attorney called her death "unnatural," the death is not being treated as a homicide.

The Suffolk district attorney's office declined to comment on whether the bag washed up on shore had been tied shut.

"Our No. 1 priority is identifying her," DA spokesman Jake Wark said. "We won't be ready to discuss any charges or anything related to a criminal investigation, if there are any, until we determine who she is or the cause of her death."

Figuring out who she is or how she died is far more difficult than TV shows or movies make it seem.

"Real life isn't TV," Wark said. "You can only check fingerprints and DNA in a database system where people have either submitted their prints or have been arrested."

Authorities stressed that they will protect the identity of anyone with information on Baby Doe. This includes undocumented immigrants who might be reluctant to come forward.

"In a case this tragic, the authorities want to get to the bottom of the situation, they have no interest in offering someone up for deportation," Massachusetts immigration attorney Matthew Maiona told Metro.

"The Boston Police and local community police departments … are in the business of solving crimes," Maiona said. "When a child is found deceased, we're talking about something so heinous that they won't care who brings them the information."

1 The Dalai Lama celebrates turning 80 with three-day birthday bash

The Dalai Lama is celebrating his 80th birthday with a three-day California bash. A number of fellow Nobel Prize laureates, minor celebrities and thousands of followers joined in on the fun, according to the Economic Times.

The renowned Tibetan spiritual leader was presented with an 8-foot-high birthday cake and a snippet of "Happy Birthday" sung by 1997 Nobel Prize winner Jody Williams.

While 18,000 people were inside, giving the 14th Dalai Lama a standing ovation, several hundred protesters stood outside holding posters that read, "Stop lying," and "Hypocrisy."

The Dalai Lama has been in exile from China since 1959.

Over the next two days, the religious figurehead will go on to discuss climate change and participate in two panels: one on wisdom, vision and experience and the other on youth leadership and the significance of education. MEGAN FU, METRO

2 Pope draws half million to outdoor Mass in Ecuador

Pope Francis celebrated Mass for more than half a million Ecuadorians on Monday and hinted he wanted a major Vatican gathering this year to find ways to reach out to Catholics who feel excluded by the church.

On the first full day of a three-nation "homecoming" trip to South America, the Argentine-born pontiff was in Ecuador's second city, Guayaquil, a steamy port sometimes referred to as the world's "banana capital," given its bustling fruit trade.

In line with his simple style, he rode into the city in a small silver Fiat. REUTERS

3 Smell flowers, not smoke: Seattle parks curb cigarettes

Smoking cigarettes and other tobacco products in Seattle's parks became illegal on Monday, as the Pacific Northwest's largest city joined other American metropolises in restricting puffing in public.

Seattle's Parks and Recreation officials voted in May to ban smoking in all of its 465 parks. It had previously required smokers to maintain 25-feet minimum distances from other visitors in any publicly accessible park.

On Monday, the city, on its website, encouraged parkgoers to "smell flowers, not smoke." REUTERS

4 Man posing as guard steals $75,000 from Oklahoma Wal-Mart

A man dressed as a security guard walked out of an Oklahoma Wal-Mart with $75,000 in cash, a crime that went undetected until the real security guards showed up later to transport the money, police said.

The suspect walked into the Wal-Mart on Saturday in Bristow, southwest of Tulsa, dressed in clothes similar to those of a Loomis armored truck employee. He went to the cash office, signed a deposit slip and walked away with the money, Bristow Police said.

Police were called when the real Loomis personnel arrived less than an hour later. REUTERS

5 Historic flyby of Pluto on track despite glitch

NASA said it expects the New Horizons spacecraft to be back in service on Tuesday after a computer glitch over the weekend threatened its upcoming historic flyby of Pluto.

Nearing the end of a nine-and-a-half-year journey to the solar system's unexplored outer reaches, New Horizons shut down radio communications with Earth for a nail-biting 81 minutes.

The cause of the problem was a timing flaw in the final batch of software uploaded to the spacecraft. The mission will provide the first up-close observations of Pluto when it passes within 7,800 miles of the icy planet at around 7:50 a.m. ET on July 14. REUTERS

San Francisco. Suspect who shot and killed woman on pier was on probation

A 32-year-old Pleasanton, California, native was shot in the chest on Pier 14 in San Francisco at 6:30 p.m. last Wednesday, SFGate reports.

Kathryn Steinle collapsed and her father, Jim, performed CPR until the paramedics arrived and rushed Steinle to San Francisco General Hospital where she died two hours later.

Suspect Francisco Sanchez was detained shortly after the killing, and it is unknown whether the shooting had a target or not. Sanchez was on probation at the time of the shooting.

A gun believed to have been used in the shooting was recovered in the water next to the pier by police dive teams on Thursday, KGO TV reports.

Gillian Christensen, spokesperson for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said Sanchez had been previously deported five times, most recently in 2009, USA Today reports.

Germany, France warn time is running out

Not much time. German Chancellor Angela Merkel urged Greece to put proposals on the table this week after voters reject terms of bailout in referendum.

France and Germany told Greece to come up with serious proposals in order to restart financial aid talks, raising pressure on Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras to compromise a day after his country voted overwhelmingly against more austerity.

After a meeting in Paris, German Chancellor Angela Merkel and French President Francois Hollande said Athens must move quickly if it wants to secure a cash-for-reform deal with international creditors and avoid crashing out of the eurozone.

Raising the stakes on the Greek leader ahead of a eurozone summit on Tuesday, the European Central Bank decided to keep a tight grip on funding to Greek banks, which have been closed for more than a week to avoid a massive outflow of money that could lead to their collapse.

The ECB also decided to raise the amount of collateral Greek banks must post for any loans. The move doesn't affect the lenders right away, but it was a warning shot by the ECB to Greek banks that their fate lies in its hands.

And a German finance ministry official dismissed the idea that Berlin would be willing to concede some debt relief to Athens, a position that Tsipras' government has long sought.

Still, in a sign that Athens is keen to seek a new deal, Greece's combative finance minister, Yanis Varoufakis, resigned, apparently under pressure from other eurozone finance ministers who did not want him as a negotiating partner.

Tsipras had earlier promised Merkel that Greece would bring a proposal for a deal to an emergency summit of eurozone leaders on Tuesday, a Greek official said. It was unclear how much it would differ from other proposals rejected in the past. REUTERS

Expert on Greek future.

So-called 'Grexit' would be catastrophic for Greece

What will the future bring? Yulie Foka-Kavalieraki, a Ph.D. candidate at the University of Athens and co-founder of GreekCrisis.net, gives her insight.

What effect will the "no" result have on negotiations with the EU?
I suppose they're still open to seeing one proposal in good faith by the Greek government, but they'll certainly hold on to their minimum terms for substantial and specific reforms, as they have done all these years of the Greek crisis. Tsipras will try to use the result of the referendum as a bargaining chip at the negotiations. He definitely hopes that the European partners will accept a new agreement that will include debt relief in order to satisfy the "no" voters.

Will it mean a Grexit?
The "no" vote of the referendum may well offer, to some European leaders, an excuse to push Greece out of the eurozone. This will probably have minimal consequences for Europe, but it will be devastating for Greece because its economy could never support an independent currency without a production base. So a Grexit would be catastrophic for Greece. A Grexit is the worst-case scenario.

DMITRY BELYAEV, MWN

Question

What do citizens expect?

"No" voters expect no more austerity and a new agreement that will include debt relief. Most of them also expect that the Greek government will do its best to stay in the eurozone.

Surprise! Mila Kunis and Ashton Kutcher got married!

Apparently for Mila Kunis and Ashton Kutcher, the saying goes, "First comes love, then comes baby, then comes a supersecret holiday weekend wedding where all your friends and family are sworn to silence." Doesn't really have the same ring to it, though. So apparently Billy Joel wasn't the only person perusing the "How to surprise your loved ones with a wedding" archives on Goop, as Kunis and Kutcher officially tied the knot over the holiday weekend at some place called the Secret Garden at Parrish Ranch, which is secluded and surrounded by apple orchards and an hour-and-a-half drive from Los Angeles. And honestly, if you're close to Kunis and Kutcher, and they invite you out to a Fourth of July party at something called "the Secret Garden," that should already be enough of a clue. Also, this is becoming enough of a trend that we need a better term than "surprise wedding." How about "ninja wedding"? That would totally make it OK to incorporate smoke bombs into the ceremony, right? Ladies, back me up here.

Conspiracy theorists tackle Demi Lovato's stage tumble

Stage my own pratfall? Never!

Hey, did you see the tumble Demi Lovato took during a recent wet and wild daytime gig in Los Angeles? If you didn't, Lovato herself helpfully tweeted out the video. In it, she slips on the slick stage and face-plants before brushing herself off and jumping straight into the pool with the rest of the crowd. But some folks — namely Vulture's Jesse David Fox — are suggesting that Lovato staged the whole thing to corner the lovable klutz market. That's pretty crafty, if she did. When did the Internet make it so hard for any of us to trust anymore?

What Kit Harington's hair is trying to tell us

Diminutive "Game of Thrones" star Kit Harington proved to be too much of a distraction at Wimbledon when he showed up still sporting his shaggy Jon Snow locks. You know, the very same hair he'd been very vocally complaining about having to maintain during his tenure on the hit series. But after Season 5's shocker ending — and Harington's insistence that, to his knowledge, he would not be returning next year — you'd think now would be the time to finally redeem that Supercuts coupon he's been holding on to. Plus, it's been particularly hot in London lately. But no, there he is, still looking like Jon Snow. So does this mean his character isn't actually toast and will be coming back next year? Or did he finally just come to terms with having his hair that length, a kind of follicular Stockholm syndrome? Whatever it means, maybe he should invest in some hats for the next few months.

Emilia Clarke: More than Daenerys Targaryen

In "Terminator Genisys," Emilia Clarke takes over the role of badass Sarah Connor, previously played by Linda Hamilton and Lena Headey. / PARAMOUNT PICTURES

Emilia Clarke doesn't want to be typecast. The "Game of Thrones" star, who plays the determined Mother of Dragons Daenerys Targaryen, has said she's reluctant to do nudity — one of the reasons she turned down "Fifty Shades of Grey." "I have done naked scenes before, and I was worried about being stigmatized by doing it again," she admits. Now she's in "Terminator Genisys," playing a much fiercer character than Anastasia Steele: Sarah Connor, the mother of postapocalyptic revolutionary John Connor (Jason Clarke), who in the film's own timeline has been fighting alongside nice killer cyborg T-800 (Arnold Schwarzenegger, again) since childhood.

Do you feel you've been lucky with the roles that you've received?
If being lucky means being able to work for many years seeking an opportunity, then yes, I've been lucky. Television gave me a boost, but I don't want people to remember me as Daenerys Targaryen from "Game of Thrones."

The characters you play tend to be very strong. How much like them are you?
I'm not ultra feminist, but I feel that I identify with girls who can do everything and who use their power to defend good causes. I now get to play with a very different version of a young Sarah Connor, and I like that a female character has become iconic.

You seem to gravitate toward action and fantasy.
I have fun. Although for that, you have to be in shape and have good arms: Holding weapons, shooting and running involve a lot of wheezing. When you see a big action movie, it seems like everything is easy, but when you start to do it, it's not. Especially with Sarah, who's a tough woman who becomes a warrior and draws strength from all sides.

Would you like to create a feminist movement?
I don't know; I think it's good enough to work from my trench. My character on "Game of Thrones" is a feminist, but in real life, I'm very different from that character. But there are some aspects that I do admire. I see my character as an icon of feminism. She is strong and fights against everything.

Does anything worry you or make you laugh about your career?
Flattery makes me very sad, especially when you are notified that you were chosen as the most desirable woman in a magazine — that sort of thing. I worry about "Game of Thrones" ending, because it is a very important part of my life as a woman and actress. But you know what they say: Dreams don't last forever.

GABRIELA ACOSTA
@metronewyork

One more thing

You have said in various interviews that you don't want to do nude scenes with every project.

Yeah, right — I always say I should do more exercise, but I don't have a sporty spirit. Something that I do have clear is that I have no objection to taking off my clothes, as long as the story justifies it.

Five things you never knew about 'Clueless'

Iconic. Jen Chaney's book "As If!" spills all the secrets from the cast and crew.

The whole cast still feels the loss of Brittany Murphy. / PROVIDED

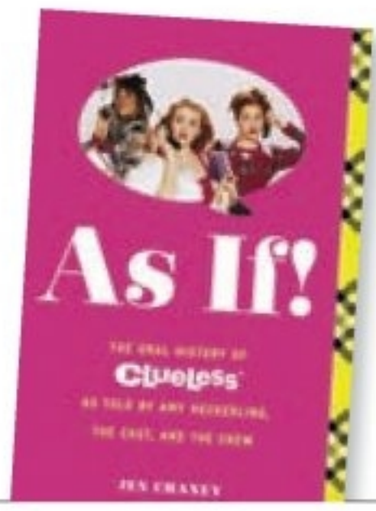
To celebrate the 20th anniversary of "Clueless," journalist Jen Chaney rounded up the cast, crew and other crucial players to spill behind-the-scenes secrets about the movie. All the juicy stories are in her new book "As If!" (out today), but we couldn't resist spilling a few here. For even more, head to Metro.us/books.

1 Reese Witherspoon almost played Cher. And that's not the only cast change surprise. Angelina Jolie was also up for the role of Cher and Ben Affleck was almost cast as Josh. Dionne's boyfriend Murray was almost played by Dave Chappelle. Was the casting director buggin' or what?

2 The clothing budget wasn't outlandish. Costume designer Mona May didn't want the girls to look like runway models; she wanted them to look like mall rats. Her clothing budget for 63 outfit changes was $200,000, quite modest for a big blockbuster movie. One of the few splurges for the film: the plaid Jean Paul Gaultier outfit Cher wore for the first day of school.

3 Murray's braces were fake. "I did not have braces. I never had braces in my life," actor Donald Faison says in the book. "[The braces in the movie] are fake because I had an extra tooth and they wanted to hide that because it kind of looked weird when I smiled. So they put braces on me," he says. Now you know!

4 Cher's report card has a wrong last name. A close look at Cher's report card says her name is Cher Hamilton, but her teacher Mr. Hall calls her Cher Horowitz in class. The discrepancy is a total mistake due to the fact that in the script, Cher didn't actually have a last name. So when Mr. Hall, played by Wallace Shawn, was handing out tardy slips, he had to improvise, and he called her Cher Horowitz. The last name stuck, but the report card prop wasn't switched out.



5 Director Amy Heckerling hasn't completely let go of Brittany Murphy. Murphy's untimely death in 2009 was felt by everyone who knew her through "Clueless." Heckerling has her own special way of remembering her: "I have Brittany Murphy's silver Doc Martins that she wore to the dance," she says. "They fit me. I just like having a piece of her."

MAKE HEALTHY YOUR NEW HAPPY

Get into a pickle

Your kitchen becomes your medicine cabinet when you start fermenting.

EVA KIS
eva.kis@metro.us

Going vegan is so last year — the new trend is to eat food that's alive.

A recent study of New England college students found that those who describe themselves as neurotic felt less social anxiety if they exercised and ate more fruits, vegetables and, crucially, probiotic foods like tofu, sauerkraut and yogurt.

The microbiome has been getting a lot of attention, but research on good bacteria in our gut and its ability to influence our physical and mental well-being is just beginning. Fermentation is one experiment you can try easily and safely at home.

We asked Tara Whitsitt, whose love of food grew into her mobile kitchen-workshop Fermentation on Wheels, to give us a primer.

How safe is it?

"Food fermentation is very safe. If anything, they're safer than canned goods because the bacteria E. coli cannot survive fermentation."

Will it make my apartment smell?

"If you're concerned about the smell, maybe introduce kimchi later. But sauerkraut, cucumber pickles, kombucha, sourdough, kefir — these foods don't have a huge effect on the smell in your space."

Will I smell?

"If anything, it's going to make you smell better; you'll be healthier and your skin is going to look nicer."

What do I need to start?

Fermentation is "just salt and vegetables," says Whitsitt.

Find a jar with a wide enough mouth: Fermentation is an anaerobic process, so you'll need to put something on top of your veggies to make sure they stay underwater.

What should I avoid?

"Temperature fluctuations are not ideal; it's best to have a temperature-stable space, between 68 and 76 degrees."

How long does it take?

It's subjective and depends on the vegetable (water-heavy ones like cucumber ferment faster). Whitsitt used sauerkraut as an example: "If you like your sauerkraut milder, ferment it for a week. If you like it more sour, three weeks to a month — it'll be funkier."

A note about kombucha

You may have heard about people getting sick from homemade kombucha, which is fermented tea. There's an important difference from regular fermentation. "With kombucha, it's an aerobic process, which means it needs oxygen to do its job," explains Whitsitt. Since kombucha is allowed to "breathe," things like mold can get inside. If it looks or smells funky, don't take chances.

Opinion

It seems as though many are apologizing to Bruins general manger Don Sweeney in the last few days. Much of that has to do with the realization that Dougie Hamilton did not want to play in Boston.

When Hamilton was traded for a trio of draft picks just hours before the NHL Draft, it left a lot of us searching for answers in a somewhat angry tone. Since then, Sweeney has made some nice moves. Most recently, he stole 27-year-old free-agent winger Matt Beleskey from the Anaheim Ducks with a five-year, $19 million deal, and traded for 6-foot-6 forward, and Dorchester native, Jimmy Hayes.

It's clear what Sweeney is looking for: grit, passion, heart, and most importantly, pride. The type of pride that comes along with donning the spoked-B on your jersey, wanting to play in a hockey-crazed city like Boston. It's also pretty clear that that's not something Hamilton wanted to do. So the Bruins traded him to the Calgary Flames for a first- and two second-round picks. Following plenty of initial anger around New England, apologies thrown Sweeney's way have ensued.

While I think the acquisitions of Beleskey and Hayes are smart additions for a GM who's trying to put a competitor on the ice next year, I'm not here to apologize for my harsh criticism of the Hamilton trade, even after seeing that Hamilton didn't want to be here.

One thing that people fail to mention is that Hamilton was a "restricted" free agent. Had another team sent an offer sheet his way — which is something that's very rare, by the way — all the Bruins had to do was match it and he remains in Boston. If there was no offer sheet from another team, then Hamilton ultimately had no leverage. After all, he was a restricted free agent.

What was he going to do, sit out the season? Give me a break. The Bruins could have played hardball, and they didn't. All because they didn't want to spend the money on a 22-year-old top-pair defenseman who wanted out of town.

But here's what I know: money talks. And an easy cure for an unhappy pro athlete is a big contract. Even though Hamilton's deal with Calgary (six years, $34.5 million) is only $1.5 million more than what the Bruins' final offer was, you can't convince me that Hamilton would have turned down $7 million per season to stay in Boston. I don't care how much he disliked it here.

Some say that would have been overpaying. Not me. I believe he's worth that kind of money. And the Bruins will regret not "overpaying" him and making him happy, in my honest opinion.

I mean, we're talking about a team that's now traded two top-four defensemen for draft picks in less than a calendar year. The other two top-four D-men? Zdeno Chara and Dennis Seidenberg. Those two aren't getting any younger.

Hamilton is a franchise-caliber player. He has the type of skill-set for a young defenseman that every team in the league is looking for. But when he began to cry about Boston, the Bruins acted quickly and shipped him off to Calgary.

Surely, Hamilton gets some of the blame. But I still can't let the Bruins off the hook.

And yes, Sweeney's made some nice moves the last couple of days. It's led to a lot of media and fans apologizing to him for the way they angrily reacted to the Hamilton trade.

Just don't consider me one of them.
